Τίτλος ομιλίας	Innovation in second language teaching: Reconnecting to SLA
Περίληψη	In this talk, a strong connection will be made between the need for innovation in second language teaching and the need for teachers to develop a knowledge about the nature of language, the nature of communication, and how acquisition actually happens. Language scientists know that language is not textbook rules and chart, but teachers might still think that what winds up in people's heads is what they see in textbooks. It is also important to have a working knowledge of communication. What is it? What are its characteristics? How does it develop? The same questions raised in relation to language and communication must be addressed to developing an understanding of how language acquisition happens. The future for innovative language teaching requires for language teachers to develop a knowledge of the nature of language, communication and acquisition. The questions is: How do we make such a knowledge common place in language teaching?
